

The Afterlife Egyptian Museum

Mariette st., Tahrir square, Cairo

Open 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. daily

Ticket booth closes 4:15 pm

Evening hours: 5:30 pm to 9:00

(Sundays - Thursdays)

Ticket booth opens 5:30 pm to 8:00 pm

For information:

send an email to

egyptianmuseum@gmail.com

Tel. (02) 2578 2452; (02) 25796948

Fax. (02) 2579 6974

Temporary Exhibitions:

Room 44 on the ground floor.

Child Museum and Educational Department:

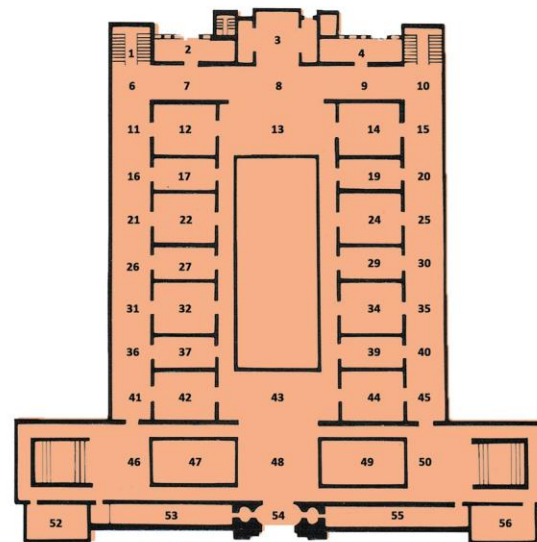

On the western side of the museum

Gift shops and cafeteria:

On the western side of the museum

Public Relations:

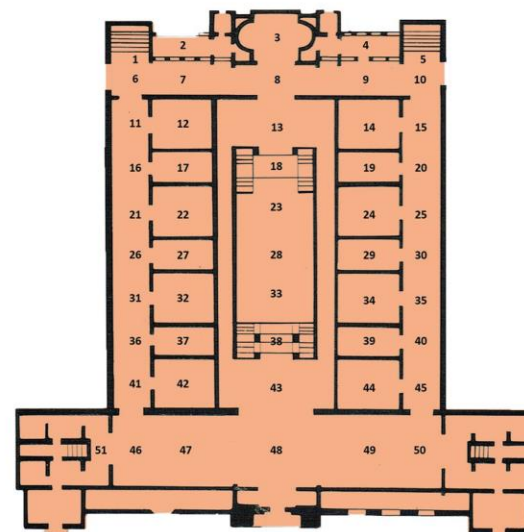

At the entrance to the museum. This is also where to inquire about the clinic and the lift for handicapped people.

Upper Floor

Main Halls:

- Tutankhamun
3-6-7-8-9-10-13
- Yuya & Thuya
15-20-25-30-35-40-45
- Tanis & Jewellery collections
2-4
- Mummy Rooms
52-56
- Animal mummies
53
- Fayoum Portraits, Ostraca & Papyrus
14-19-24-29-34-39-44
- Sarcophagi & Tombs Furniture
11-16-21-26-31-36-43
46-47-48-49-50-54-55

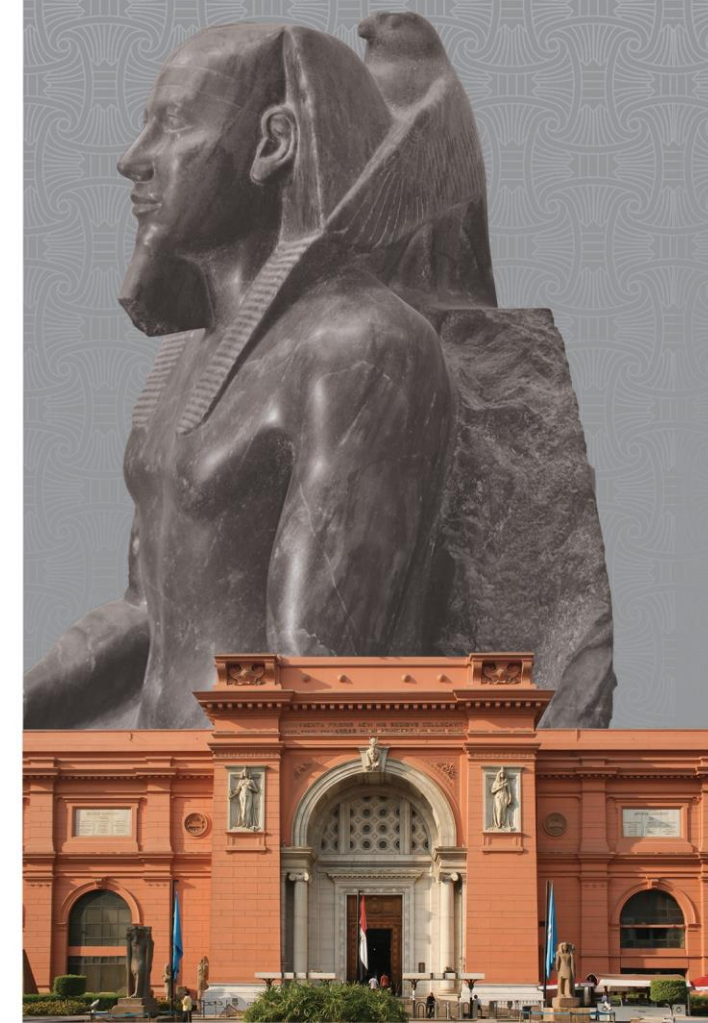

Ground Floor

Main Halls:

- Atrium
18-23-28-33-38
- Prehistory & Archaic Period
43-48
- Old Kingdom
31-32-36-37-41-42-46-47
- Middle Kingdom
16-21-22-26
- New Kingdom
6-7-8-9-10-11-12-13-14-15
- Akhenaten
3
- Late Period & Graeco-Roman Period
24-25-30-34-35-40-45-49-50

The Afterlife Egyptian Museum

The Afterlife Egyptian Museum

The museum history

The Egyptian Museum in Cairo (EMC) houses the world's largest collection of antiquities from Ancient Egypt. The first antiquities collection was displayed in a school in the Azbakiya area (only a few kilometers from Tahrir Square) in 1835, before being transported to a hall in the Cairo Citadel. In 1858, Khedive Said Pasha appointed the French Egyptologist Auguste Mariette (1820–1881) as Director of a museum in the Boulaq section of Cairo. The formal inauguration of the Boulaq Museum took place on October 18th, 1863, and was attended by Khedive Ismael. After an inundation in 1878, the Egyptian government decided to transfer the artifacts to the sumptuous palace of Khedive Ismael at Giza, which became a museum in 1891. The Egyptian government decided to build the EMC in the heart of Cairo to be the first building designed specifically to serve as a museum. The work started in 1897 and the museum was opened on November 15th, 1902. The move to the new museum in Tahrir Square was coordinated by French Egyptologist Gaston Maspero (1846–1916). The museum, designed by the French architect Marcel Dourgnon in the neo-classical style, comprises more than 100 display halls arranged on two floors. The garden of the museum contains the sarcophagus and bronze statue of Mariette in its western part, surrounded by busts of distinguished Egyptian and foreign Egyptologists.

Tanis Treasures

In the late 1930s and early 1940s, an entire complex of royal tombs was found intact at Tanis by Pierre Montet, yielding four gold masks, solid silver coffins, and spectacular jewelry. The treasures are one of the greatest archaeological discoveries of all time. But because it was discovered during World War II and published only in French, it went unnoticed. Montet found the tombs of Osorkon II and Takelot II, where he found hundreds of ushabtis, and in the tomb of Sheshonq II he found a solid silver coffin with a falcon's head, a gold mask, and beautiful gold jewelry. Finally, on February 15th, 1940, he excavated the tomb of Psusennes I, where he found gold and silver bowls and cups, ushabtis, and the granite sarcophagus of Psusennes. The king's face was covered with a spectacular gold mask and on his body was jewelry equal to Tutankhamun's.

Yuya & Thuya Treasures

On the 17th of December, 1904, the seasonal excavations in the Valley of the Kings began, carried out by the Egyptian Department of Antiquities and sponsored by the American lawyer Theodore Davis. On the 12th of February, 1905, the access to the tomb was discovered. The tomb owners were not ordinary private individuals: they were the parents of Queen Tiye, Pharaoh Amunhetep III's wife and the grandparents of Pharaoh Akhenaton. All the objects were packed together in a single chamber. The objects from the tomb include objects used in daily life, such as the chariot of Yuya and Thuya, and wonderful furniture including beds, chairs, and gilded wooden boxes inlaid with faience, ivory and ebony. The bodies of Yuya and Thuya were found in their coffins. Their bodies are in very good condition and are very well preserved due to the high quality of mummification that was used. The two golden masks were also discovered on the mummies.

